COMMUNITY ANNOUNCEMENTS

Mazal Tov to Toby Zuckerberg on becoming a Bar Mitzvah. Congratulations to his parents Lloyd Zuckerberg and Charlotte Triefus and to his grandfather Roy Zuckerberg.

Condolences to Bella Brenner on the passing of her mother, Lola Borg.

Noah, however, and Abraham and his descendants, a new category of tzaddikim, heroic in their justice and righteousness, arise to save the day. First comes Noah: the Nautical genius who navigates the raft of state to keep it afloat among the shifting waves and return it to terra firma. The Providential emergence of the righteous tzaddik in his generation, the Biblical superman (as opposed to the Nietzschean), who uses his might in the cause and service of right, is the guarantor of the durability of the cosmos. The cosmos stands, like a building, upon powerful pillars, whose role it is to uphold architectonic law, the framework or structure upon which the building rests. If the pillars don’t function as supports to that structure of natural/moral law, the structure collapses, the cosmos returns to chaos, and they perish with it. But if he stands firm and strong in his supporting role according to the governing laws, the righteous super hero becomes a founding pillar, who, like the Greek Atlas, upholds the world. To be sure, there can be too much emphasis upon architectonic law. Law and structure can artificially over-regularize, making men slaves to a dominating order. Such was the generation of the Tower of Babel. This too can topple the overambitious structure. But in that case there is not a return to the quite same kind of chaos. Noah the Nautical may not look as solid and steady as landed heroes. But that great Nayanv who steered the ship of society and kept it afloat through shifting waters can still bea con to our boats as we try to navigate back to solid ground through the stormy seas of today.

Myth Must Uphold Right
(a.k.a. "The Righteous One Re-Founds the World")
Rabbi Ira Rohde

What brought on the Flood? The Torah text and our commentators seem to indicate that the Deluge was God’s reaction to an "earth filled with violence" and "all flesh corrupted its way upon the earth." The connection is with the last Parasha and its complaint of human degradation, which is puzzlingly connected to a seemingly-mythological story about the "children of god" interbreeding with human women, giving birth to a race of heroes or giants who attract renown. The suggestion that the "ereb" that God has overcreated mankind has to do with this "miscegenation" seems fantastic and inscrutable, as does the tale of the Deluge itself.

On the other hand, the Targum and the first rabbinic commentary quoted by Rashi, reacting against this fantastic explanation, seem to go to the other extreme, making the supposedly heinous crime which gave the great Flood the mundane crime of "gezelah," "robbery." That Midrashic explanation that the great crime of this generation seems deliberately over-rationalized, allegorized, as if it were, into a moral holism, so much so that it leaves us at a loss to explain how this fantastic punishment, never heard of before or after, fits the crime.

But let’s analyze this further: Gezelah or robbery is carefully distinguished in the texts of the Bible, Talmud, and legal codes from genezah, the more common term for "stealing." Both involve illicitly taking something that doesn’t belong to you. But "stealing" involves "stealth," some type of concealing what the "burglar," or "thief," is doing. They are punished differently in the Bible, and the legal discussions and drawings of distinctions can get complex. A thief still shows some obeisance to legal authority, challenging it only in secret, not openly. A "robber" is more brazen, openly challenging the right of others and the authority of law which protects those rights. A robber makes immediate recourse to the use of force and so is more "violent." A society "filled" with the brazen, open use of force to seize whatever the powerful wants, a society which shapes "right." It is a world inextricably lawless and disorder so is at extreme that power becomes the effective arbitrator in the world. Whoever is stronger wins; might makes right.

Of course, power and force may have a certain place in a system of justice and politics. Thrasymachus in Plato’s Republic seems to argue that the naturally powerful have a natural entitlement to leadership. And ancient ethics was not separable from justice and politics, so there as well, power has a place. But our Torah would seem to indicate that power obligates the strong to exercise their power wisely and justly, in the interests of keeping proper order and justice. Might must be on the side of right, justify the right, sup-port and back it up. That may take not just a mighty man, not just a leader, but rather indeed a superman or hero, a true magis-trate. Some paleo-archeologists think the Bible’s giants were descendents of the Neanderthals. It seems that Neanderthal males were fertile with homo sapiens females, and not vice versa, specifically as the Torah describes the an-cestors of the giants. However, whenever humans exercise power. "Neanderthal-style," i.e., at the end of a club, without regard to justice, law, and righteousness, the very fabric of the world is breached. When the high and mighty giants of society use their divine-given power to further only their selfish interests, subverting the law and order upon which the cosmos was founded, the world returns to chaos. The very ground for law and order wash away from beneath society’s feet.
