From Slavery to Empathy: The Foundation of Morality
Rabbi Richard Hidary

Parashat Mishpatim immediately follows the Ten Commandments and elaborates predominantly on the ethical demands in the second half of the Decalogue. We therefore would expect this parasha to begin with laws of murder and homicide. Instead, however, we find that capital cases are listed second (Exodus 21:12-32), only after the laws concerning slavery. Rather, the slavery laws serve as an introduction to the entire ethical code because the impetus to treat others with compassion stems from our own experience as slaves.

Every time the Torah enjoins us to remember that we were slaves in Egypt, the purpose is not that we should hold a grudge against the Egyptians. On the contrary, Deuteronomy 23:8 commands us: “You shall not abhor an Egyptian, for you were a stranger in his land.” Rather, the Torah teaches us to remember how we suffered in Egypt in order to never cause others to suffer. Indeed, the essence of all of ethics, whether in the golden rule of Leviticus 19:18, in modern philosophy (see Emmanuel Levinas, Ethics and Infinity), or in recent psychological research (see Simon Baron-Cohen, The Science of Evil: On Empathy and the Origins of Cruelty), is the ability to empathize with others.

Although the Torah recognizes the institution of slavery, it is completely transformed to conform to higher standards of ethics. The non-Hebrew slave gains his freedom if the master causes him permanent bodily damage and the master can receive capital punishment for murdering the slave. The slave’s humanity is thus preserved in these laws and in the prohibition from working him on the Sabbath. The Hebrew slave is treated more like a hired worker than what we usually think of as a slave. Slavery may have been a necessary safety net for people in extreme debt, but it is clear that the Torah’s ideal is for all humanity to be free. Here is one example of how the Torah contrasts with widespread ancient Near Eastern standards. The very last law in the Hammurabi Code states:

If a slave says to his master: “You are not my master,” if they convict him, his master shall cut off his ear.

Exodus 21:5-6, on the other hand, legislates: If the slave declares, “I love my master, and my wife and children: I do not wish to go free,” his master shall take him before God. He shall be brought to the door or the doorpost, and his master shall pierce his ear with an awl; and he shall then remain his slave for life.

Jews Among Persians and Greeks:
Reading Esther in Context
Monday, March 21 | 7:00 pm
Bet Midrash Special Guest Speaker: Professor Joseph Angel
Joseph Angel is a scholar of ancient Judaism with a focus on religion and history in the Second Temple Period. He is the author of Otherworldly and Eschatological Priesthood in the Dead Sea Scrolls (Studies in the Texts of the Desert of Judah 86: Leiden: Brill, 2010), which explores the imaginative depictions of angelic and messianic priestly figures in the Dead Sea Scrolls as a reflection of the religious worldview of the Qumran community and broader segments of Second Temple society. His other publications include articles on ancient Jewish magic, the Second Temple of Jerusalem, and Qumran liturgy, as well as commentaries on Second Temple period texts. He is the recipient of research fellowships from the Alexander von Humboldt and Yad Hanadiv/Beracha Foundations.
