“Haye Sarah,” Eulogy for a Noble Age
Hazon Rabbi Ira Rohde

Parashat Haye Sarah begins with the death of Sarah and ends with the death of Abraham and Ishmael. Its structure unfolds, so to speak, in a twilight, in the close of an age of legendary nobility, seen in the golden glow of its setting sun. That age will be replaced by a very different era. The descriptions of the world in Genesis and beyond has been shifting away from an ideal world, first dramatically with the Expulsion from Eden, but continuing more subtly through the decrease of life-spans and stories of Noah and Abraham, gradually becoming more like our own. Every age had its problems and flaws, it is true, and no age was an absolutely ideal paradigm. But they are still paradigmatic, and the paradigms become less and less ideal. The Bible’s heroes aren’t nearly as legendary as those of the Greeks, where we could speak of a kind of “twilight of the gods,” but the Patriarchs and further figures in the Torah and Prophets are a lord of heroes, living in ages which are successively less “heroic.” Noah saved all land animal life on the entire planet, Abraham, starting out as a sojourner, becomes a powerful, respected and wealthy lord of the land, the progenitor of a dynasty, a “(אָדָם הַיָּשָׁר הַיָּשָׁר prince of God),” The age of Abraham is depicted as an age of the gallant and noble fight for the just and the right, and Abraham’s connection to God is straightforward, honorable, natural and direct.

Isaac is heir to that heroic age. But he lives through the transition to an age which is less and less “heroic,” certainly in the sense that heroism and righteousness in succeeding ages becomes less and less straightforward and successively less natural. That is why Isaac has trouble seeing the way forward in the negotiations with Rebecca and Jacob, who have a more twisted path to follow. Pioneering generations of all kinds often find similar differences between themselves and their successors.

But that’s further down the road; in this Parashah, the Torah wants us to focus on the nobility of the pioneering, heroic generation of Abraham and Sarah, and from no vantage point was this more apparent than at life’s end, as they reached their funerals. We use the high ‘il form “hispel” today to mean a eulogy; in this story the root term properly was used as a synonym for bewailing. However, to fittingly bewail or deeply feel the loss of anyone you must first lovingly appreciate and dramatize their heroism, so I fantasize that at her funeral Abraham had plenty about her to love and praise! In negotiating for a burial site, Abraham speaks and acts with the grace and diplomacy of a prince. He will not be content to be given a mere burial plot for his wife; he must own the entire field outright with the burial cave therein. He insists upon paying full price and having the sale witnessed legally, which he punctuates with graceful, diplomatic bows. Abraham insists upon a proper wife of noble lineage for his son. Like a king, Abraham has a vizier, who looks after his affairs, whom he entrusts with this mission. The servant/vizier takes a proper oath, and Rebecca’s nobility is borne out by her graciousness to the guest. And at that point, the servant returns the graciousness, giving precious, gracious gifts to Rebecca and her household.

UPCOMING PROGRAMS AND EVENTS

Revealing the Enduring Ethics of Aggadah: Levinas’ Talmudic Readings
2-Part Winter Wednesdays Learning Series
Rabbi Richard Hilary

Wednesdays, December 7 and December 14 | 7:00 pm
Emmanuel Levinas was a French philosopher of ethics and existentialism. In addition to his major contribution to general philosophy, Levinas was also a Jewish community leader and teacher. For many years, he delivered an annual lecture at the Colloquia of Jewish Intellectuals analyzing a Talmudic passage philosophically. These readings remain some of the most innovative, interesting, and inspiring Talmudic interpretations that succeed in unpacking some of the depths of Talmudic thought and its relevance to modern society. In these two lectures, we will attempt to re-enact those lectures, follow Levinas’ steps through a textual analysis, and assess how well they stand the tests of time, scholarship, and enduring value.
Free and open to the public.

Exclusive Tour of “The First Jewish Americans: Freedom and Culture In The New World” Exhibit
Rabbi Meir Soloveichik and
Museum Curator, Dr. Debra Schmidt Bach

The New-York Historical Society
