Don’t Use the Sacred Torah
Rabbi Ira Rohde, Hazzan
After minyan Thursday morning, Dr. Morris Shamah gave a class in which he asked why the Book of Leviticus ends the way it does, with a kind of “sacred ending.” The basic law of purity and sacrifice, the “Priestly Code,” ends with the traditional blessings and curses for keeping or not keeping the laws, ending with: “These are the statutes and the ordinances and the law which the Lord gave our forefathers himself and between the Children of Israel, at Mount Sinai, by the hand of Moses (Lev. 26:46).” But Leviticus doesn’t end there. Another 34 verses, a whole extra chapter, is added, which seem to plunge us back to technicalities of Levitical law, all of which seem to be vaguely related to the subject of vows of dedication: dedicating oneself (and redeeming oneself), dedicating one’s animals, one’s house, fields, and other property, and if so they can be redeemed. Then, after this “addendum” or code comes the “real” ending verse: “These are the commandments to the Children of Israel which the Lord commanded Moses at Mt. Sinai (Lev. 27:36).” What is the point of this “addendum,” and what can we learn about the teachings of Leviticus from it that ends in this way?

Dr. Shamah gave his answer, and I gave another, which I will start with here. I said that most of these latter laws seem concerned with sacred “property rights” should be enforced properly and fairly. Fixed prices and procedures are set for the redemption of persons and goods, in instances where they can be, and in other instances rules are set so that the kind of pure domesticated animals needed for regular sacrifices cannot be redeemed, and if attempts are made to redeem them, penalties are imposed. Although the actual word isn’t used here, all of these laws aim to avert the heinous crime of “גנאי זהב,” which I shall translate roughly as “the theft of the Sacred.” I pointed out that some ancient pagan cultures didn’t take sacred property quite so seriously; Sacrifices were commonly eaten by the sacrificer and the priests, and sacred property was commonly embezzled or otherwise encroached upon and misappropriated. The Torah, by contrast, especially the Book of Leviticus, takes the sacred realm and especially the dedication of sacred property extremely seriously. Many sacrifices are burnt up completely, allowing no use by man. Man is forbidden in the strongest terms from trespass, encroachment, or infringement upon the sacred realm.

But we can extend the generalization even beyond this: The critical sins for which Israel is punished in Chapter 27 have to do with:

- תנהך אין מאכל יד / "eating from the stalks" — their usurpation whereby they usurped Me (26:40).
- הר סבולות / "the Great Priestly Burden" — Israel has no right to cultivate the Land, for the Land properly does not belong to man to do with it whatever he wants: The Land belongs to God. Man has only property rights over the land, "because Mine is the Land, for strangers and sojourners are there with Me." For encroaching upon Sacred Property by cultivating when he had no right, man will be subject to the fine or penalty of desolation according to and corresponding to his embezzlement; that, in fact, the formulae used in the “curses” section: “All the days of its desolation [the Land] shall rest [corresponding to] your Sabbaticals upon which it has not rested when you dwelt upon it (26:35).

And we can extend the theme one stage further and view all of Leviticus as about Sacred Property. “For the Land is Mine,” says God, and we, His People, also belong to Him. In offering sacrifices and tithe and sacred property, we are merely giving back to Him what was His to begin with. The Land, indeed, the Cosmos, is sacred. Every disobedience and infraction of God’s Law is a usurpation, a taking of that to which we have no right to the ruin of the Sacred. We treat that realm as a Sacred Trust for which we are grateful, cultivate it carefully, and guard its principles from violation, that Trust will blossom with the blessings of abundance. But if we encroach, infringe, misappropriate, and embezzle from that Sacred Realm, the Sacred Trust will turn to naught.
